Category:Software testingQ: Should the thread be released in viewDidUnload? I have a view controller which is loaded in a thread (so the view gets instantiated in the background, and I'm using the viewDidUnload delegate method to release any object that's not part of the view hierarchy). Should this thread be released in viewDidUnload? That is, if the view has been removed from the view hierarchy, should the thread be released, or does it work differently on iOS? For context, I'm calling out to the delegate from within viewDidUnload, or viewWillUnload, which I consider to be part of the view hierarchy, so I would think the object should be alive for at least as long as the view lives. A: (1) YES! (2) NO! If you use NSTimer, your thread can be released immediately. If you use CGEventPost and kEventClassKeyboard, your thread can be released immediately. If you use NSThread and NSObject, you may need to keep the thread alive for longer. (In other words, CGEventPost is good, not NSThread. NSThread just helps to start your own thread.)

So, (1) YES! It's a view controller, it should be destroyed immediately. If view hierarchy is destroyed, this does not destroy the view controller. If view controller is killed, this does not destroy the thread. NOTE: In viewDidUnload/viewWillUnload, you should probably not kill the thread right away because if you try to access some object while another thread is accessing that object, you'll get some unexpected result. Instead, if you just release the objects, it's ok if the thread is killed right away. A: Keep the thread alive for as long as the view is alive in - (void)viewDidUnload { //.... [self.thread cancel]; [self.thread release]; self.thread = nil; } A: For a typical

Cocoa application you should have no problems releasing the thread in viewDidUnload. Edit: The problem is getting the view controller to be destroyed as well. If viewDidUnload is the first time the view controller's view is unarchived,

The White House will face questions about the President's tax bill since the president called for Congress to pass it before December. The committee, chaired by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Ron Johnson, R-Wis., is meeting on Wednesday. Johnson met with White House Senior Counselor to the President, Stephen Miller, on Tuesday. Committee Democratic Vice Chairman Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said the meeting could give the public a better perspective on the impact the bill would have on families. "You've got to understand why we're here," Wyden told Fox News. "This bill is about stopping the IRS from prying into your taxes, making sure that you can keep the money you've earned." Democrats have expressed concerns over the details of the bill and believe it would jeopardize programs like Medicaid and Medicare. "We get very little detail from the American people about what in their lives would be affected," said Wyden. "It's not enough of a public discussion to get a good sense of the details of this bill." The committee is expected to vote on the legislation next week, despite pressure from Senate Republicans to delay action until after the midterm elections in November.
